We also encourage you to submit information about any important corrections of mistakes or dubious information.R$ is the strength of the first-order breakup interactions. The resulting scattering rates are depicted in Figure \{fig:scatt\} as a function of the impact parameter $R$. ![Model collision rates for the process $^{208}$Pb + $^{208}$Pb $\to$ $^{208}$Pb$_{2}$ for $R$ = 0, 2, 4, 6 fm.

\fig:scatt\{width="75.00000%"} The total cross section rises with increasing impact parameter R , but only by less than 3.5%. This is too small to affect previous diffusion calculations, which are based on a 10% scattering rate at $R = 6$ fm. The rise of the collision rate with increasing R can be related to the increasing range of low-energy nuclear interactions in the surface of the projectile. In particular, the measured cross section for the fusion of the projectile into the second ^{208}Pb nucleus is about 10 mb at all impact parameters, whereas the measured fusion cross sections in cold-nuclear-matter are about 30 mb. The significant reduction of the measured fusion cross section in comparison to the expected fusion cross section in cold-nuclear-matter is apparently related to the size of the fusion barrier. The relation of the scattering probability to the number of low-energy nuclear interactions near the surface and at the surface of the projectile can be probed by cross-section measurements for fusion of ^{16}O projectiles into ^{208}Pb
